Collection Description

Biographical Note

John Berryman (1914-1972), American poet and scholar, was born John Allyn Smith, Jr. in McAlester, Oklahoma, to John and Martha Smith. In 1926, John Sr. committed suicide, an event that often recurred as a theme in his son's poetry. Within a few months, Martha Smith married a man named John Berryman. The family moved to New York City and young John took his stepfather's surname. After a suicide attempt in 1931, Berryman entered Columbia University, where he studied English with Mark Van Doren. He graduated in 1936 and completed two years of graduate study at Cambridge University. In 1942, he married Eileen Mulligan, the first of his three wives. They divorced in 1956 and Berryman married Ann Levine, with whom he had one son. Berryman married Kate Donohue in 1961 and the couple had two daughters.

Berryman taught at multiple universities throughout his life, including Wayne State University, Brown University, Princeton University, and Harvard University. In 1955, he was appointed lecturer in humanities at the University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, where he remained until his death. He published his first major collection of poetry, The Dispossessed, in 1948, followed by a biography of writer Stephen Crane in 1950. In 1956, Berryman published Homage to Mistress Bradstreet, which was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize. Berryman is perhaps best known for The Dream Songs, a collection of 385 sonnet-like poems told from the perspective of Berryman's alter-ego, Henry. In 1964, the first installment, 77 Dream Songs, won the Pulitzer Prize. Berryman published the second installment, His Toy, His Dream, His Rest, in 1968. The two volumes were republished as The Dream Songs in 1969.

Berryman struggled with alcoholism and depression throughout his life and was hospitalized multiple times. He committed suicide in 1972 by throwing himself off of the Washington Avenue Bridge in Minneapolis.

Scope and Content Note

The collection consists of materials relating to American poet and scholar John Berryman from 1956-1990, including correspondence, poetry and printed material. Correspondence consists primarily of letters written by Berryman to his close friend and colleague Ralph G. Ross, chair of the Humanities Department at the University of Minnesota. In the letters, Berryman describes writing the poems that would become 77 Dream Songs, as well as his struggles with his health and alcoholism.

Poetry consists of typescript drafts of poems relating to Berryman's The Dream Songs, as well as uncollected poems. Many of the poems are signed by Berryman and/or inscribed to Ross. Of particular note are the 20 dream songs drafted for Ross's birthday, which include a number of poems that were considered for 77 Dream Songs but not included in the volume. Untitled poems are identified by their first lines and dream songs have been labeled where possible. Printed material in the collection primarily post-dates Berryman's death and includes clippings about the poet, as well as fliers and programs from University of Minnesota events relating to Berryman's life and work.
