Collection Description

Administrative History

The Southern Library school was established in Atlanta, Ga., in 1905. In 1907 it became the Library School, Carnegie Library of Atlanta to reflect its relationship with the Carnegie Library. The school was funded by the Carnegie Corporation, 1914-1925, and became affiliated with Emory University in 1925. In 1930, the school officially came under the administration of the University and became the Emory University Library School. In 1948 the Library School became the Division of Librarianship of the Emory University Graduate School.

Tommie Dora Barker (1888-1978), a graduate of the Library School of Carnegie Library of Atlanta, served as its director and head librarian, 1915-1930. She later became dean of the Emory University Library School, 1936-1948. Barker was also an active member and officer in several professional organizations including the American Library Association, Georgia Library Commission, Georgia State Board for Certification of Librarians, Southern Library Association, Georgia Library Association, and Association of American Library Schools.

Scope and Content Note

The collection includes the papers of Tommie Dora Barker as director and head librarian of the the Library School, including administrative records, alumnae records, course outlines, and student and prospective student folders. Some records relate to the Emory University Library School or document the school's relationship with Emory University and the transition to the Emory University Division of Librarianship. The collection also includes correspondence, organizational records, clippings, memorabilia, and other papers, relating to Barker's professional achievements and her work with American Library Association, for which she served as a field agent in the South (1930-1936). Notable correspondents include Andrew Carnegie, Edwin R. Embree, Leo Mortimer Farnot, Clark Foreman, Frederick P. Keppel, and Louis Round Wilson.
