Collection Description

Administrative History

Since its earliest years in Oxford, Georgia, Emory College (now Emory University) has been organized into academic departments reflecting different areas of curricular emphasis. By the mid-nineteenth century, Emory offered courses in at least six separate departments: Latin Language and Literature, French, Greek Language and Literature, English Literature, Mathematics, and Physical Science. Many more departments developed after Emory relocated to Atlanta, where the new university established professional schools and began offering graduate-level work in several disciplines. By the early twenty-first century, Emory University was comprised of over seventy academic departments and programs offering academic programs from the undergraduate to the master's and doctoral levels.

Scope and Content Note

Collection includes materials related to twenty-nine departments and programs operating within Emory University during the middle decades of the twentieth century. Records include departmental memoranda, statements of purpose, and historical sketches, as well as promotional material such as brochures, lecture announcements, and announcements of faculty appointments. In addition to academic departments, the collection includes material related to academic programs and institutes, such as the Program in Creative Writing and the Institute for Vico Studies.

Arrangement Note

Arranged alphabetically by subject.
