Read, Cornelia E. Parker (b.1837) [1 item]
MF1 "Teaching Days", an account written September 18, 1906 of her experiences as a teacher between 1853 and 1865. Her first school was in the country outside Wallingford, Connecticut, her home town. The next year she went to another district school in Fairhaven" where with 60 pupils she spent most of her efforts "to keep the peace." The third year she taught in her own childhood school. The next year she went as a pupil and assistant teacher in the Cleveland Seminary. The following year she was employed by Mr. Foy, an Episcopal clergyman of New England birth, a graduate of Yale who had recently married his fourth wife, to teach on his plantation between Vicksburg and Jackson, Mississippi. He also employed Miss Colt, a distant cousin of Miss Parker, to teach on a neighboring plantation. On the trip down the Mississippi from Cairo, Illinois, Miss Parker noticed the Negroses, slave or free, and was "greatly depressed." She was disappointed in the appearance of the countryside which she found monotonous, colorless and primitive. Although very critical of what she saw of slavery, she considered Mr. Foy a kind master. She remained on the plantation for two years (1857-1858) before returning home. Thereafter she taught, in 1859-1860, at a boarding school near Lexington, Kentucky. Among her students was Lettie Green, later the wife of Adlai Stevenson, Vice President in Cleveland's administration. In 1861 she taught in a private school at Wallingford; in 1862 at Sayre Institute (Lexington, Kentucky); in 1863 at Gothic Seminary (near her home); in 1864 at Miss Haines Private School, New York City. In 1865 she gave up teaching for marriage and "the sanctity of a sheltered home."
